On the one hand, it is the weaker North Korea far more than the stronger South Korea that holds a master key to shaping the future of the divided Korean peninsula. On the other hand, the future of North Korea itself - if it will have any future - largely depends on the support of outside powers, most important, South Korea, China, the United States, Japan, and Russia, in that order.

The Next Great North Korean Famine - TIME

To this day, Seoul and Pyongyang adamantly insist there is only one ultimate future for the Korean Peninsula, and that is reunification. But the legacy of the Korean War was to seal the great power compromise of 1945 in three years of blood, not just Korean blood, but Chinese, American and allied nation blood.

Gone are the classical notions of “serving the great” as a reciprocal bond in which the great must also serve the small. In the week six of our course, let’s return to the concept of “serving the great” to think about not just South Korea’s alliance with the US, but also both Koreas complicated ties to China.
