Math and poetry have more in common than it might seem at first glance. They are each precise, creative, and patterned in concisely woven ways. And they can both contribute to engaging summer fun. Here's an idea: keep math vocabulary in front of mind in the off-school months by writing poems with those words.

These are one of the most effective math circle times. Have some toys in a bag that link to a song. A good example is Five Little Men in a Flying Saucer with five little alien toys. Put the Little Aliens in the middle of the circle, count them, and then sing the song. After every verse count them, take one away, and see how many there are left.
